Public Administration PhD Student Graduate Assistantship in Nonprofit Capacity Building, Leadership, and Racial Equity

The University of Nebraska at Omaha (UNO) School of Public Administration seeks applicants for a Public Administration PhD student assistantship starting in Fall 2020 focusing on nonprofit capacity building, leadership, and racial equity. Applications are due January 15, 2020.

This assistantship includes tuition, a stipend of $18,000 per academic year (for 9 months), subsidized health insurance, and office space. The student filling this position can also apply for conference travel funding (around $1,000 a year) and additional research support ($5,000 twice while in the program). Teaching opportunities may also be available for additional pay after year two. The assistantship includes four years of funding (dependent on the student continuing to meet program requirements). U.S.-based or international students are welcome to apply.

Key faculty working within this area include:

- Dr. Tara Kolar Bryan, Associate Professor, Public Administration—Research interests include nonprofit management, nonprofit capacity building, and strategic management.

- Dr. Nuri Heckler, Assistant Professor, Public Administration—Research interests include intersectional racial oppression, organizational theory, and human relations management.

The PhD in Public Administration in the UNO School of Public Administration focuses on the role of public and nonprofit organizations in a democratic and diverse society. The School of Public Administration boasts a supportive and collaborative academic culture. The program is ranked 25th in Public Affairs, and 11th in Nonprofit Management in U.S. News and World Report.

UNO is located in Omaha, Nebraska, which has an extremely affordable cost of living, many amenities, and a diverse and vibrant nonprofit and philanthropic community.
